******** SHORT STORY OF THE DAY

Ď00000000000 � 0000000000 YOUTH AT THE HELM.

From the Chicago Times-Herald.

Youth, extreme routh, is the note of modern jour-nalism.-London Correspondent.

A row of hoops and a few roller skates stood outside the principal entrance to the magnificent buildings of the new daily journal; men fringed the curb with alluring mechanical toys. "One punny," said the line of men to the youthful sub-editors, as they trooped in at the swing doors, "one punny buys the whole show." A rough haired boy, the only one who did not stay to look wistfully at a tin sailor dancing hornpipe on the pavement, trotted stolidly up the broad steps.
"The chief," said a veteran uniformed attendant of nearly 16 years of age, "is asting

"Bother the chief!" said the rough-haired boy, with a burst of annoyance.
"The chief'll bother you, sir," said the elderly attendant, with respect, "If you keep him waiting."

"Are you sure he asked for me?"
"The chief," said the aged attendant, "particularly mentioned you, sir, by name. His words was, 'send that woolen-headed old fossil of a foreign editor to me the manusche errors."

moment he arrives."

"Oh," said the boy, a little abashed, "he

moment he arrives.

"Oh," said the boy, a little abashed, "he lid mean me, them."

The other sub-editors looked out of their rooms as he passed along the corridor and made faces at the foreign editor as he walked slowly to the chief's room. A rustle near to him as he approached the chief's room made him stop.

"Willie," said a girl's voice; "Willie, come here a moment. D you know what you did in this morning's page five?"

"Wasn't page five all right, Daisy?" asked the foreign editor, frightened out of his air of maturity. An insistent treble voice at the end of the passage demanded to know whether the foreign editor had arrived or whether he had not arrived.

"You must go," whispered Daisy, "Be a man and face it bravely."

"I don't want to leave you," said the boy "I don't want to leave you," said the boy revously.

"Nonsense!" said the little girl with a grown-up look. "I've got my fashion column to finish. Call in as you come back."

The foreign editor knocked timidly at the door of the chief's room, and a shrill "Come in!" answered. The foreign editor took off his little silk hat and tried to hum carelessly as he entered the room. "Hello!" he said genially to the large lad who stood at the fireplace. "How's the world using you? Paper going well and birong?"

world using you? Paper going well and btrong?"

"Sit down," said the chief, repressing his annoyance. "I want to talk to you."

"Bet you twopence," said the boy, "you can't run and jump on the table from where you're standing."

"I bet you twopence," shouted the chief, "that I can run and jump on you."

"Why?" said the foreign editor innocently, "What have I done?"

"A simpler question to answer would be what haven't you done?" The chief snatched up a copy of the journal bearing the current date. "Just look at it!" screamed the chief. "Don't look at me—look at that!"

"One or two errors appear to have crept in," admitted the foreign editor as he glanced down the deplorable columns.

"Crept in!" repeated the chief. "Confound you! They've galloped in! What is the idea of calling Salisbury 'the leader of the stalwart radicals'? How long has Cuba been an island on the south side of Khartum?"

"Those blessed printers want a nurse to

"Those blessed printers want a nurse to look after them," said the foreign editor look after them," said the foreign editor uneasily.

"And what's the meaning of this word 'Daisy' on nearly every other line? 'Her majesty's battleship Daisy has joined the channel squadron.' There is no such battleship, sir."

"Thought you wanted exclusive news."

"The Empress Daisy has interfered on behalf of the captured rebels.' There is no Empress Daisy," said the chief impressively.

"I can't help that," urged the boy, his face now very red. "I don't make empresses."

"It is rumored,' read the chief, 'that her serene highness, Princess Daisy of Saxe-Meiningen, is shortly to be married to a popular London journalist.' There is no Princess Daisy, of Saxe-Meiningen, and, if there were, she would not marry a popular London journalist. Now, I want to ask you seriously, what the deuce does it sil mean?"

all mean?"
"I'll tell you," said the boy impulsively, with a burst. "I can't keep it a secret any longer. I may just as well get it off my mind and have done with it. Fact of the matter is, I—I'm in love."

"Love!" echoed the chief, patting his upper lip where a mustache would some day grow. "Afraid I don't quite understand."

any grow. Afraid 1 don't quite understand."

"I'm in love," repeated the boy foreign editor wildly, "and I don't care who knows it, and her name's Daisy, and I can't think of anything else, and—and—"

He burst into tears.

"My poor old chap," said the chief, not unkindly. "This is painful. I am deeply moved at this sudden breaking up. Age has crept upon you with its relentless pertinacity, and has rendered you incompetent for the work of modern journalism. Somehow, I had never thought of you as an old man, and yet—"

"I-I am nearly 15," sobbed the foreign editor.

"I-I am nearly 15," sobbed the foreign editor.
"Ah!" said the chief thoughtfully, "when one gets to that age—haven't you a hand-kerchief?" He took a seat on the back of a chair and contemplated his assistant with a sigh of compassion. "What can we do for you, I wonder? I don't like to turn off an old hand, after he has spent his best months in our service, without some compensation."
"If you please," sobbed the foreign edpensation."
"If you please," sobbed the foreign editor, "I should rather—rather like to go back to school again."

back to school again."

"Strange," murmured the chief, "strange what odd fancies the old folk seem to get!"
He turned to the boy. "Your wish shall be acceded to," he sald. "Fortunately I have one or two applications for your position from men who are doing well in the lower fourth at Eton, and there will, I think, be no difficulty in filling your place. You shall retire on a handsome superannuation allowance."

shall retire on a handsome superannuation allowance—
"Sir." said the boy, "accept an old man's thanks."
"And I trust that you will enjoy the otium cum dignitate that you deserve. There are still years of life before you which you can devote to some other profession; modern journalism at your time of life is, alast no longer possible. Take a chocolate cigarette before you go."

Out in the passage the discharged foreign editor met the fashion correspondent, explained the situation to her, and gave her the smaller half of the chocolate cigarette.
"It's a bit of a wrench." said Daisy, "but I tell you what I'll do. I'll dress my half differently and look as old as I possibly can—say, 16—and then perhaps they'll give me a retiring allowance, too, and we can meet and.—"
"Etes" suggested the ex-foreign editor.

"Kies," suggested the ex-foreign editor, "You've taken the word from my lips," she said.
